

THE BEER DRINKER'S GUIDE

...the most important factor in determining the quality of a beer is the quality of the water used in its production. The water should be soft and free of chlorine, and should be rich in calcium and magnesium. These minerals are essential for the yeast to ferment the beer properly. In addition, the water should be free of any impurities that could affect the flavor of the beer.

...the most important factor in determining the quality of a beer is the quality of the water used in its production. The water should be soft and free of chlorine, and should be rich in calcium and magnesium. These minerals are essential for the yeast to ferment the beer properly. In addition, the water should be free of any impurities that could affect the flavor of the beer.

...the most important factor in determining the quality of a beer is the quality of the water used in its production. The water should be soft and free of chlorine, and should be rich in calcium and magnesium. These minerals are essential for the yeast to ferment the beer properly. In addition, the water should be free of any impurities that could affect the flavor of the beer.

...the most important factor in determining the quality of a beer is the quality of the water used in its production. The water should be soft and free of chlorine, and should be rich in calcium and magnesium. These minerals are essential for the yeast to ferment the beer properly. In addition, the water should be free of any impurities that could affect the flavor of the beer.

